picture book, but can it be called a picture book when there are no pictures? Entering the field of unique interactive books begging to be opened, including Herv Tullet's Press Here (Chronicle, 2011) and Adam Lehrhaupt's Warning: Do Not Open This Book! (S. & S., 2013), this title will instantly intrigue children. Upon opening the book, readers are drawn in ('Here is how books work: everything the words say, the person reading the book has to say. No matter what.'). What follows is an uproariously raucous time, with readers being forced to utter nonsense words ('blork,' 'bluurf') and phrases that will have young listeners in stitches ('And my head is made of blueberry pizza.'). Admittedly, there are no illustrations, but Novak has employed the use of various sizes of black typeface with expansive white space and color to highlight some of the text.
